Historical Memory

The featured articles in this issue focus on remembering two of the greatest social reformers and activists of the 19th century. Susan B. Anthony and Frederick Douglass loom large in American historical memory. From a Hall of Fame for Great Americans to busts of prominent individuals, these articles detail the honor bestowed on historical figures and how those honors influence the way we perceive the past.

Compelling Question

How do we remember the past?

Learning Objectives

Students will be able to:

- identify, describe, and evaluate evidence about events from diverse sources
- analyze evidence in terms of content, authorship, point of view, bias, purpose, format, and audience
- make inferences and draw conclusions from evidence
- create meaningful and persuasive understandings of the past by fusing disparate and relevant evidence from primary and secondary sources and drawing connections to the present
- identify, describe, and contrast the roles of the individual in opportunities for social and political participation in different societies

Preserving Family Memories by REMEMBERING AN ICON

Rochester Blackalls are descended from a long line of anti-slavery activists.

BY SALLY PARKER

When retired stenographer Gertrude Blackall sat down in 1929 to type up her childhood recollections of Frederick Douglass for the Rochester Historical Society, she shared happy memories of a family friend. Far from political observations of a famous civil rights activist and commanding orator, her stories were intimate snapshots of a man who cherished time spent with children and loved a good laugh.

Gertrude's family supported Douglass during his fifty-year fight to abolish slavery and to gain equal rights for African Americans. He relied on his supporters' collective financial, political, and moral support—at times heavily. Gertrude's remembrances, along with letters between their families, provide a closer look at the personal connections Douglass and his family had with supporters.

Douglass—then Fred Bailey—escaped from slavery in Maryland in 1838, aided by his wife-to-be, Anna Murray, a free black woman. They settled in New Bedford, Massachusetts, where they adopted the Douglass surname and started a family. Douglass joined the anti-slavery movement, and in 1847, they moved to Rochester and lived there for twenty-five years, where he rose to the international stage as a sought-after anti-slavery speaker and publisher.

Born in 1867, Gertrude lived in Rochester most of her life. In the 1890s, when women in business were a rarity, she ran her own stenography business and school. Her memories of Douglass in Rochester reach back to her younger years, a young child when Douglass and his family left Rochester for Washington, DC, she remembered he rode a large white horse, "and being so tall and handsome, with such a massive and commanding figure, and such unusual dignity of bearing, he was a striking personality."

Gertrude recalled a little boy in her neighborhood who would yell out a racial epithet at Douglass when he rode his horse. One day, Douglass, watching for him, jumped from his horse, caught the boy and held him aloft "in his powerful grasp," echoing the word back to the child.

For many years, Gertrude's family had a warm friendship with Douglass, his first wife, Anna Douglass, and his second wife, Helen Pitts Douglass. Children were a source of much delight for him. He had five children and twenty-one grandchildren.

"Mr. Douglass had a great fondness for young people," wrote Gertrude, whose siblings were Minnie, Robert, and Florence. "He taught my brother to whistle on his fingers, an accomplishment which delighted his boyish heart, as well as the child-heart of Mr. Douglass. All of us children loved him, because he was one with us in spirit.

"As I've grown older, we heard him deliver some of his masterly orations, in that soft, rich voice of his, which was capable of such great power."
